

Will I find the front discs are "Hard" or "Floppy" and are they 2 gigabyte or just 144 megabyte ? Are they marked and if so where ? Can I change the fronts to 5 gigabyte and refit the floppy's on the rear to improve the performance ?

Your reply is eagerly awaited.

Yours faithfully,

Editor's Note.

Dear "Troubled" (Very Troubled !)

It is not advisable to fit "Floppies" to the front end. They contain so much information that the slightest application of the brake pedal is likely to cause the rear wheels to suddenly lift smartly upwards and both driver and passenger will find themselves in a tangled heap in the back of the car in front.. Hard discs are preferable but since the "TF-1700" has no onboard computer they can become frustrated... and this can result in effects far worse than that outlined above. Do not fit discs of any format to the rear end.....the hand brake won't work !

The exact reverse is true for a modern Mercedes or BMW, where just about everything is now coupled to a computer.....perhaps you are confused ?

Dear John and Freda,

I have just received the February "Newsletter", it looks like a very busy year. We will try to come to some of the events as well as going to Guernsey in June :- mind you it would be hard to get to the Bronte as well !

I had my rear bumper rechromed recently and it was only when it was returned that the specialist pointed out how it was made. I was astonished....but perhaps to old Naylor hands it is old news....it is actually made of 9 different bits welded together.

I had previously fitted a TF bumper I bought at Penshurst last year. This looked O.K. but the curvature at the ends was different, although with a lot of packing washers it didn't look too bad.

Anyway... kind regards

Dear John and Freda,

I'm afraid that from our end there is little of news to report. Our Naylor is up on blocks in the garage here and no one drives it because no one is here. My children are all off in Switzerland or East Germany, I can't fit into the car and my wife has her own Porsche which she naturally prefers.

The weather has not been good for open touring and we have been off travelling.

The children all want to sell the car, but we are too busy to advertise it and bother with informing prospective buyers that it might be available. It is left hand drive and hence not really ideal for England, Japan or any other place where the traffic keeps to the left.
